WasteBuster Query #7480

Suggestion:

I have read the most recent proposed changes to the WCB regulations. A good part of these changes are somewhat meaningless, such as taking out redundant responsibilities. Eliminating the repeat of any persons responsibilities is somewhat of a yawner, who cares if its repeated, might even be a good thing to drive the point home. It seems to me that paying a group of persons to debate, negotiate or what ever, simply to make meaningless changes to regulations is a waste of time, effort and tax payers money. Any group of persons tasked with regulatory development/change should focus on real meaningful matters, such as the replacement of exposure limits with the ACGIH threshold Value Limits. Weather any one agrees with this change or not, it is a real meaningful change.

Solution:

Ensure these groups are focused on substance, forget about the meaningless "fluff".
